A population of Rhombomantis maculatus living in an alpine steppe in the Tyrolean Alps coexists with a population of R. minor, which is native to the area. The two populations occur in microclimatic and habitat conditions that are similar, yet in sympatry they show no interspecific interference effects. Hence, the population that is native to the area can also be found in sympatric condition with the invasive species, providing excellent conditions to explore the role of chemical communication in intraspecific reproductive interference. We showed that the latter is based on differences in sexual attractiveness when males of both species were exposed to different pheromones. The overall sexual attractiveness of males is significantly lower in native species, as indicated by the rejection rate of native males when confronted with males of the other species. Native and invasive males have significantly higher attractiveness when exposed to synthetic-like compounds than when exposed to non-synthetic compounds. Some non-synthetic compounds caused rejection of both, native and invasive species. The population density of one of the two species is negatively correlated with the level of sexual attractiveness, which suggests that males try to increase their attractiveness in relation to the surrounding environment. The findings are discussed in terms of female choice and male choice. Furthermore, we discuss why a potential invasive species can gain a competitive advantage over the native species.Q: Cannot convert from int to TimeSpan? First of all, I'm
