In the midst of political turmoil, the one party leader who wants to create a new framework for Poland to be set free from its post-communist shackles is out of favour. Jaroslaw Kaczynski has no allies in the ruling elite. Both the Civic Platform (PO) led by Donald Tusk and Donald Tusk's own party, Law and Justice (PiS), have taken a hard stance against him. The only party that remains friendly to Kaczynski is the so-called "Third Camp" - a political grouping of renegade former communists who entered parliament in October in a bid to shake up the political system. Only a few days ago PiS voted to expel Kaczynski from the party and political scene. Kaczynski has called it a "violation of Polish law" and decided to take his case to court against the party's move. But with the political arm of the Constitutional Tribunal ruling in favour of the PO a few weeks ago, this fight against the party's leader is virtually impossible. Either PiS will have to accept the ruling or it will end up in a lawsuit against it. Either Kaczynski will have to rethink his actions in the past and get used to not being the single most powerful political figure in the country, or he will end up being dismembered from the party from which he continues to rule as president - the Law and Justice party. The strongest, strongest group of people in Poland could be on the receiving end of this struggle between the far right and its leader. And all eyes are on the man who has been preaching for years that Poland should keep its communist past and build a new Poland, free from foreign meddling. "We are taking a great risk because our friends abroad may harm us in a very bad way. We are but a few," said Pawel Konieczpolski, the former secretary of the Information Ministry who has e79caf774b
