In particular, U.S. President Barack Obama's calls for China to end its alleged interference in the South China Sea, and a sometimes-tense standoff with Japan, have helped the U.S. president build up momentum in his internationalist-or-isolationist battle against China over trade and other issues. But a recent meeting between Chinese President Xi Jinping and South Korean President Park Geun-hye suggests a U.S. policy that is less combative, and more isolationist, is in the works. Chinese officials' statements following their meeting on March 14 showed that they consider the relationship with Seoul to be an important

What's New in the Photoshop CC 2015 Version 16?

Congress is clearly uninterested in investigating. Congress is, in fact, so uninterested that they've let their chamber pass the most restrictive gun laws in the nation. As more and more people are killed by a paranoid individual, who takes advantage of the fact that congress doesn't really care to enforce the laws they pass, people are calling on both sides of the aisle to open a congressional investigation. Ah, but what can you expect when a guy who was in the administration is involved? Nina Totenberg wrote an article in the NYT on Wednesday called "Obama's Unlikely Gun Ally," in which she points to the administration's tight relationship with the NRA. In the waning days of the Obama administration, the Justice Department quietly reversed a longstanding legal interpretation that had permitted local police to stop and question people without any suspicion of criminal behavior. The agency's new interpretation was incorporated into a memo issued last June that was received by Justice Department attorneys on Thursday, on the eve of the anniversary of the school shooting in Newtown, Conn. Local police cannot stop and question individuals unless they suspect that a crime has been committed or someone is in grave danger, but now they have more latitude to do so. Although the new interpretation has long been anticipated, it had never been formally issued. There are two things in that paragraph, which if the writer did some better research would be discovered to be false. The first is that local police don't have much of a right to engage in racial profiling. What they can do is engage in "reasonable suspicion," that is, that something is up, and that investigation can result in legitimate stops. The second point, however, is the most relevant to this situation. It's that if you're a law enforcement officer in a very rural area, your brother is a state senator, and you believe that should be permitted, you have a powerful friend in law enforcement. The most concerning thing in that article, though, is that President Obama isn't just the point man who killed gun control in America. He's also protecting the tail who helped him do it. As it turns out, the president may have been more adept at building relationships in Washington than he was at campaigning for his proposals. Last week, Rep. David Schweikert, an Arizona Republican, made an effort to raise Mr. Obama's standing among state lawmakers, in a conversation with a colleague. "When I asked him, he said, 'Well, I
