Field of the Invention This invention relates generally to the field of printing or the like, and more particularly to an apparatus and method for producing a pattern image on a sheet of material, preferably a web of material, utilizing a computer imaging system, wherein the method produces the resultant pattern image as a fixed printed image as compared to a pattern image that may be formed by hand. Still more particularly, the present invention relates to a pattern image production or printing system which receives an electronic image of a design and produces therefrom a finished printed product such as a decal or printed product. More particularly, the present invention is directed to an electronic pattern image production system which comprises a computerized imaging system used to create electronic images of patterns which may then be reproduced or printed on a substrate in a fixed printed image. 2. State of the Art One of the best known forms of advertising and marketing, especially in connection with the printing industry, are decals. Decals are typically a sheet of paper or a plastic material that has preprinted images thereon, such as logos, company names, advertising graphics, etc. The sheet of material is then placed over a surface, such as a window or door frame, and secured to the surface with an adhesive or the like. A release film may be placed on the adhesive, thus allowing the user to remove the sheet of material from the surface later. Other materials may be used to provide a protective layer over the adhesive or the release film, and may include, for example, flexible sheets or skins, or shrink-wrap films, or various combinations of the same. The sheet of material may also be used to provide decorations, such as designs on the surface of a building, vehicles, items of sporting goods, and the like. The sheet may also be used to cover commercial or residential buildings, walls, windows, gutters, or any other suitable locations. Decals are usually very attractive, and it is desirable for a person to keep a decal in a safe location so that it may be easily accessible if the need arises. It is therefore desirable to make a decal that may be affixed to a variety of surfaces with the least amount of effort or inconvenience. A decorating system and method for producing finished products utilizing a computer and its associated memories is described in U.S. Pat. No. 5,
