Morphine and ethylketocyclazocine as discriminative stimuli in pigeons. The relative potencies of two mu-opiate agonists, morphine and ethylketocyclazocine (EKC), as discriminative stimuli for pigeons were determined. Each drug produced stimulus generalization to other mu-agonists, i.e., morphine generalized to EKC, EKC generalized to heroin, and heroin generalized to morphine. Doses of EKC (20-80 mg/kg) were needed to produce stimulus generalization to doses of morphine (20-80 mg/kg). Each mu-agonist had a relatively low potency (approximately 0.5 log unit) compared to the kappa-agonists U50, 488H and U69,593. EKC was approximately 10-fold more potent than morphine as a discriminative stimulus. Generalization to mu-agonists with a 5-fold range of potencies, and to delta-agonists with a 3-fold range of potencies was demonstrated. This demonstrates that the discriminative effects of mu-agonists in pigeons can be used as
