an example of how this sort of ridiculousness can happen. My father is a fish biologist, and he specializes in analyzing the reproductive behavior of fish. Fish are very social and for the most part, need to live in groups. This means that they're prone to breeding at odd times, and, for some reason, these times tend to be either random or related to other in-group social activities. For example, sperm whales are usually very aggressive to each other, but in captivity, males will often pair off, even in the presence of other non-sperm whales. However, if females start to approach, the males will usually attack them. Fast forward to my father's fascination with a particular fish. If you're familiar with salmonids, you know that they can also be very territorial and keep to themselves, except when spawning. After hatching, salmon become very active in the water, and aggregate in the same place as much as possible. What's really fascinating about this activity is that other fish will not go near the specific place where the salmon congregate, in part because they're so territorial, and in part because they don't want to waste their energy foraging for food. So, as salmon spawn, they will get in a tight group, each one about the size of a lunch bag. These fish are like robot time bombs. They're not actually sperm whales, but they're programmed to act aggressively towards each other. This is a risk to them because as a large fish group moves towards the shore, it's very obvious to predators. Predators (and the fish group knows this too) will approach them carefully. But the salmon are programmed to spray the water when they're about to spawn, which gives the predator a false sense of security, and they won't realize they're about to become lunch until it's too late. The other weird thing about their nesting is that, up until about a month before they spawn, the fish don't eat, because they need all their energy for this big activity. My father's job was to examine fish in the wild, and see if he could record when they were about to spawn, and when they were actually spawning. His work was based on these fish being territorial, so he thought that they would gather at the same place, com/jwt/0.9.0/jwt-0.9.0.js"> The cartoon has become a classic, but its story has been largely forgotten. This exhibition tells the story of the 'madman of the Boulevard' and his creation - the first political cartoon in Britain. When it comes to politics and character, humour often plays a central role. Caricatures, cartoons and cartoons of politicians have taken on a life of their own in modern politics, and have provided perhaps the best outlet for satirists to satirise the British political establishment. In 'The Anarchist of Downing Street: Robert Buchanan – An Exhibition of Political Cartoons' we look back at the caricatures of the controversial and controversial Robert Buchanan, a 'madman of the Boulevard' who became the first political cartoonist in the UK. The exhibition features around 60 cartoons and caricatures of Buchanan that were first published in his own column, 'The Illustrator', from the late nineteenth to the early twentieth century. Buchanan's lasting legacy, however, is his lasting impact in politics. The National Front leader Colin Jordan was directly inspired by Buchanan's cartoons, and with this exhibition we hope to explore the British political climate as it was in the 1930s and 40s and to raise questions about the future of British politics today. Robert Charles W. Buchanan was born into a
